The Pearce-Stegman House is a brick house of two storeys, of five bays with a four bay rear (south) wing behind the two east bays of the main house. All roofs are gabled, with a flush chimney at each end, and a fourth chimney in the middle of the rear wing. The rear wing has a one-storey, one bay brick extension on its east side, beside its northerly bay, and its shed roof extends to the main house to form a back porch. A three bay porch with a hipped roof and wood columns of the Tuscan order extends across the three middle bays of the north or principal front.

The main house, the north wing and its small east wing, are all of contemporaneous construction, as indicated by the uniformly bended brickwork. A small gable reefed one storey wing, extending from the east end of the main house, is a 20th century addition; it incorporates one wall of the original cellar entry, the former cornice of which is outlined in paint on the east wall of the house.

The bricks of the principal front are laid in an all-stretcher bond, but on all other sides, every eighth course is a header course.

Windows are 6/6 with louvred blines and exposed wood lintels. The front and west side limitels have a moulding applied as a cap, but rear lintels are plain. Of interest are two false windows on the west end, covered by leuvred blinds fixed in the closed position. Such false windows are not unusual in the 19th century, to achieve symmetry.

The east chimney is paneled, but others are plain. The wood cornice with bold returns at the eaves on the gable ends, extends up the rakes with a generous everhang.

The front door has bold applied mouldings defining two arched top panels; corners of panels are, otherwise, heldow, defined by the same mouldings. The front door has sidelights and a transom. Secondary doors in the wing have a transom only.

In the rather narrow center hall, the principal staircase rises, with landings, clear to the third floor. Its massive turned walnut newel with its mbulded walnut rail, turned balusters and screlled step ends, all appear original.

The mantels in the single rooms which flank the center hall appear original; boldly moulded wood pilasters support a similarly moulded frieze. Each mantel is only slightly different. Other interior work, including the four-panel doors, boldly moulded architraves, splayed and paneled window jambs extending to the floor in the principal rooms, all appear original. Nearly all the original door hardward survives in situ: locks are east iron rim locks, manufactured by Russell and Erwin, patented in 1866. Knobs are brown mineral or white percelain.

The identification of these original locks, with their patent date, suggests a construction date of no earlier than 1866. The locks were probably available for at least ten or fifteen years, thus ca. 1870 may be accepted as the approximate date of construction. The nearly-positive establishment of a date for this house, which retains virtually all original work in situ, is of great importance in dating other houses, or elements or houses, in the region.

The northerly room in the wing was the kitchen. It retains a smallish cooking fireplace, fitted with a crane, in the wing's middle chimney. The southerly chimney commences in the second storey to serve two small rooms above the kitchen, separated from the middle chimney by a hall.

Second storey details are related to those in the first storey, but simpler. Chimneys are without mantels. The third storey of the main house is roughly plastered, with board doors in partitions defining the center stair hall; the third storey of the wing is unfinished. Rafters terminate against a ridge beam.

The stone walled cellar extends only under the front section of the house; joists are straight sawn. An exterior entry formerly led through the chimney at the east end; it has been blocked by the small addition above.

A brick "summer kitchen" of one storey stands east of the kitchen in the wing. It, too, has a fireplace fitted for cooking, and a cellar, accessible through a stone entry in the south end.

A stone meat house, east of the summer kitchen, new has a concrete slab roof.

The northerly orientation of this house is unusual, explained by its facing the dwelling of its builder's parents, the Pearce-Ensor Hause  $(Q \cdot V \cdot)$
